Categories: Mom's Corner

My Baby is in the hospital

Savvy has been dealing with back to back cold and flu stuff since we were in VT in early July. She has asthma and when she gets a respiratory illness, it takes her 5 times longer than the normal person to get through the coughing stage of a respiratory virus or infection. I have been giving her breathing treatments regularly but the cough was not getting any better for almost 2 weeks.

Then she came down with a fever a few days ago followed by a rash on her torso, back of her neck, behind her ears and on her face. I treated her with Tylenol and Benadryl. The rash got worse.

So today I took her to the Ped. The Ped. gave her a couple of breathing treatments and her oxygen level was at 90 AFTER the breathing treatments. Good oxygen levels are 98-100. So the Ped. diagonsed her with Rosella and pnemonia. The Ped. admitted her to the hospital this afternoon. Cliff is with her and I am home with the triplets. We have no family to help us so this is what we have to do. My poor little baby. My heart just crushed as I had to kiss her goodbye and she whimpered through tears saying, Mommy I am going to the hospital to get better and see the doctors. It took everything I had to hold back the tears. As they drove away, that is when the tears flowed.

I have a very, very sick little girl. Please, please pray for my sweet Savannah. I feel lost without my baby,,,,my first born. I am so worried about her. She can barely breath.

She is on Extra Strength Augmentin and Prednisone.

Date: 26-08-2008