She is home where she belongs.

After 24 hours being in the hospital, Savannah is now stable and oxygen level is 97%. The hospital discharged her and she got to come home. Yay!! They were very cautious and told Cliff that she is to be watched very closely and if she turns blue or if her cough gets so bad that she is struggling to breathe. She needs breathing treatments round the clock every 3-4 hours and is on Steroids and Strong antibiotics. I am hoping in the next few days she can overcome this, my poor baby girl. She starts school next Tuesday and she has been looking forward to seeing her friends and being back at preschool. We will see how she does, it is a whole week away so maybe she can kick this thing in the butt. Her rash from the Roseola is beginning to slightly diminish and the fever is just about gone now.
